

Excerpt from The Life of James J. Hill, Vol. 1 The principal and richest source of material for this work was the letters, papers, and other documents of Mr. James J. Hill, placed at my disposal by him during his lifetime for this purpose; his answers to my questions, and his conversations with me, at different times during the ten years prior to his death, about the various phases of his work and his thought. I wish to acknowledge also with gratitude the valuable assistance I have received from others, both before and since that date. The members of Mr. Hill's family, many of his old friends, later associates, and coworkers have been generous in their contributions of fact. Since in only a few cases was it practicable to give personal credit in immediate connection with the information they supplied so willingly, I take occasion here to thank them all for invaluable aid in setting forth clearly and accurately the facts and the meaning of Mr. Hill's life. Greatest and deepest of all is the debt I owe in the production of this book to her whose sympathy and understanding have been to me continuing strength and inspiration, my wife.
